The screenshot shows a Google Toolbar Options window with the 'Search Box Settings' dialog box open. It contains the following settings:

- Explore the new search box with custom search types, history, spellcheck, and suggest
- Configure search settings:
  - Display Go button next to search box
  - Open results in: Existing window
  - Suggest popular searches
  - Suggest searches from my search history
  - Do not suggest bookmarks

- Use Google site: Colombia (.com.co)

The OK and Cancel buttons are visible at the bottom of the dialog box.
Basics of search engine optimisation

At my day job, we’re contacted every now and then by clients asking about search engine positioning and optimisation. Most of the time the client has been approached by an SEO (Search Engine Optimisation) consultant trying to talk them into paying lots of money for search engine optimisation. The SEO firms promise “guaranteed top results” and “submission to 500 000 search engines and directories”.

Many site owners are regularly contacted by scam companies of this kind, and it’s understandable that many take the bait and start paying for “top results and submission to everything”. After all, who doesn’t want their site to be highly ranked by search engines?

Many rankings are actually based on how much SEO has in common with accessibility, usability, and high quality markup – the principles of web standards. That actually makes it even better: by making your site more accessible and usable for humans, and by using valid, semantic markup, you also make it more attractive to search engine robots.

Consider the guidelines I describe here a basic level of SEO – try this first, and if you’re still not getting the results you want, you may want to look into getting help from a reputable search engine optimisation firm. If you contact someone regarding optimising your site, ask them what they will do for your site. If they suggest any kinds of shady methods, be very careful. They might get you penalised or even banned from search engine indexes. On the other hand, if their advice includes what I’m suggesting here, they will probably do a good job.

There are no shortcuts
I’ll start with the bad news if you’re looking for a quick and easy way to get great results.
